Hello there! Have you ever heard of climate change? Have you ever heard of drought? So you want to remove a large number of big trees that soak up carbon dioxide, and moreover are located near a stream, that would affect the groundwater availability of the area? Trees that are within an ESHA?

Apparently the neighbors are worried for good reason, and you should take their concerns into account.

What makes this even more ridiculous is the county's present need for low-cost housing. Is it worth all this environmental sacrifice just to make one or two more fancy country-club type houses? I don't think so.

Please do not approve this ill-thought project.
